

Michigan motorcycle accident laws have many exceptions, and are different than those for car accidents or truck accidents. For example, a motorcycle is not considered a “motor vehicle” in the Michigan No-Fault law. However, that does not mean an injured motorcyclist cannot have a case.

If another motor vehicle like a car or truck was involved in the motorcycle accident and the motorcycle was properly insured the case is similar to a regular first-party or third-party auto accident case. In those situations, a first-party claim can be filed against the insurance company responsible for No-Fault benefits. These benefits include: medical expenses related to the auto accident, wage loss, household replacement services, payment for mileage to and from medical appointments and nursing services. In addition, a third-party claim can be filed against the negligent driver responsible for causing a motorcycle accident. The damages available in a third-party claim include pain and suffering damages and excess economic benefits. If you or your loved one has been in an accident, contact us to protect your rights.
